Republicans Reorganize

The Republican Party in Michigan includes ultra-con-ervative rural representives and moderate elements. They stand for government policies almost as diverse as those of the Republicans and the Democrats. The Michigan State Senate is dominated by Republicans, 23 to 11 Democrats, and represents the party's greatest stronghold in government, but party strength there has failed of accomplishment on the point of internal division. The Republicans, with the mossbacks fighting the liberals, might present a united front to the Democratic challenge, but they couldn't agree on a sufficiently progressive Republican action program to provide responsible state government.

The people of Michigan, weary of 14 years of squabbling in state government at Lansing with a Democratic governor and Republican Legislature, elected a Republican governor on Nov. 6. They also returned a Republican Legislature, slightly stronger in GOP strength than its predecessor.

Republican Gov. George Romney had a mandate to change the set of sails of Michigan government, but not a clear course to do it. There remained the "veto bloc" of Republican ultra-conservatives in the Senate to jam up any liberalization of state government or cooperation with the Democrats for state progress, and also a Democratic state cabinet. All the members of the administrative board except the governor are Democrats.

Governor Romney got pledges of some cooperation from Lieut. Gov. T. John Lesinski, and from State AFL-CIO President August Scholle, who has spoken for the Democrats in a voice as loud as their governor. Lesinski said he wouldn't act irresponsibly when substituting for the governor. Scholle said he'd wait and see whether Romney was anti-labor.

And then the Republican state senators organized for the new session and it was one of the most promising forward steps in state government since Romney's election. A determined group of Republican moderates took the command away from the party's conservatives. Senator Stanley G. Problem State Label Cancelled

EAST LANSING - Michigan's 1963 job outlook is good says Dr. Roger L. Bowlby, asistant professor of economics at Michigan State University. Michigan is no longer a problem state in terms of unemployment, he says.

Michigan unemployment has been steadily dropping and may now be below the national average but the national figure is still "discouragingly high"

"In 78 of the 79 months between January 1956 and September 1962," he says, "Michigan's unemployment rate was worse than the national rate. In the 80th month, September, the rates were the same, 4.9 per cent of the labor

"In October, Michigan's unemployment was only 4.4 per cent of the labor force as compared with a 4.6 per cent national average. Preliminary figures for November indicate a state jobless rate of 5.1 per cent and national rate of 5.3 per cent.

"This is the first time since December 1955 and January 1956 that Michigan's rate of unemployment has been below the national average for two consecutive months.

"It is dangerous to draw conclusions on the basis of two month's statistics, but this new relationship is certainly encouraging, and there are grounds for hoping that it represents the beginning of an employment pattern which may persist for some time."

Loss of defense jobs and decentralization of the automobile industry, says Dr. Bowlby, account in large part for Michigan's unfavorable employment record during the 79-month period. These. he says, are not likely to be important factors in the next few

"At least on the basis of current statistics, says Dr. Bowlby, "there is no longer any justification for applying the epithet of 'the problem state' to Michigan, if jobs and unemployment are the basis for such a charge."

Michigan's unemployment record in 1963, Dr. Bowlby predicted, will largely depend on the overall performance of the American economy.

Regular Exercise Good Resolution For Health Seeker

"I will exercise regularly." This was the New Year's resolution recommended this year by the Michigan Heart Assn.

The Association, however, suggested several common-sense modifications. President Dr. Muir Clapper, a professor of medicine at Wayne State University, said these included:

1. Select an exercise compatable with your age and physical condition.

2. Choose an exercise you enjoy. If you exercise like a Spartan, you will fall by the wayside. The Association said the idea is to fit an exercise like hiking or calisthenics into a daily routine, while adding a weekly sports activity, like swimming, golf or bowling.

3. Once you get a routine of exercise, try hard to let nothing interfere.

4. Be prudent. If you have not exercised since you were in school don't try to start where you left off. If your age and condition warrant strenuous activity, work up to it gradually.

5. Walk more; ride less. If you can, walk to work and walk when you shop.

6. Get a physical examination and ask your doctor what forms of exercise should be avoided.

7. With intensity and determination practice that most difficult of all exercises, namely, pushing away from food in time to avoid
